*2nd Edition of the International Colloquium: Governance, Citizenship & Rule of Law

*Under the theme: Governance & Sustainable Development: Reality and Perspectives

October 8-9-10, 2020

The last decades have been marked by impressive technological and economic progress, with a consequent deterioration of the natural and ecological environment. Indeed, under the pressure of fierce competition, and to meet the demands of a constantly changing market, economies have not hesitated to intensify the exploitation and consumption of the various natural resources, which are often not reconstituted. This degradation of the biosphere seems to reach more and more a disturbing level of irreversibility, and its symptoms are constantly alarming us: waste, warming, increasing the level of the oceans, desertification, reduction of biodiversity, etc.

Researchers and decision-makers then question the fate of this progress and growth whose continuity is threatened by an irreversible destruction of exhaustible natural resources. Since the 90s, a change of course in the way of apprehending the development, has emerged and continues to assert itself, it aims to break with the model of industrial development productivist and tend towards a development said sustainable that includes the preservation of the environment, a development that seeks to "meet the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs" (Brundtland Report, 1987), it focuses on three main areas: the environment, social equity, and economic efficiency, and its implementation is conditioned by the adoption of an effective and adapted mode of governance.

Indeed, to the extent that sustainable development is made of changes, choices and adaptations, it is the system of governance, through its various decisions, that will allow it to consolidate and evolve. Otherwise, it is governance that regulates relations between different stakeholders and stakeholders, and it is up to it to institute the necessary economic and legal mechanisms to make the economy and society sustainable.

This Colloquium then proposes to shed more light on the relationships that governance can have, in all its aspects: economic, political, social and environmental, with sustainable development and equity in a broad sense. The goal is to discuss the problems, clarify the issues and propose solutions, by crossing the thoughts and ideas around the following axes:
